

Quick Tips: Who am I?

BASIC TIPS:

- Take the time to explore, think about, and understand what you're passionate about and what drives you. Having this knowledge can help you figure out the types of organizations you may want to work for and will help you to eventually stand out in an interview.
- Make a checklist of what matters most to you in a job. As you do your research on companies and positions, you'll learn what aligns with your interests and values in order to check off those boxes.
- When interviewing, you'll want to offer examples of your skills and work/life experience to show you're qualified for a position. Being able to clearly articulate who you are in an interview shows an employer you're self-aware.
- Once you know what matters to you in a job, you want to prepare so you are confident in your interview.
- Getting to know who you are as a professional is a learning process; it doesn't happen overnight. It takes time, so be patient.
